The Traveler's Gift: Seven Decisions that Determine Personal Success - The Seventh Decision (part 1)<sup>i</sup>

David meets the archangel Gabriel in "the place that never was," a large celestial warehouse that holds the lost dreams of humanity. It is the place where the angels keep all the things that were about to be delivered just as a person stopped working and praying for them. The warehouse is "filled with the dreams and goals of the less courageous." Future children, the cure for cancer, the answer to sudden infant death syndrome, collision-proofing for any mode of transportation, and so many more innovations all reside in this place because, as Gabriel explains, humans lost their courage. Humanity in general, he says, lacks the faith that produces greatness.

Gabriel explains to David that he is the last traveler. It is in his hands to change the world, and he must do so by studying the seven decisions for success, and allow the decisions to become part of his being. He must share the decisions with others, and must not quit. Those who quit often blame their failures on circumstances; a person who is depressed spends too much time thinking about the way things are now and not enough time thinking about how they could be. Those who will succeed will look at circumstances as daily lessons to be studied and gleaned for new knowledge and wisdom.

Gabriel leaves David with the final lesson on his journey: persist without exception.

Next week: We outline the final decision for success: *I will persist without exception.
